Most restaurants now fear closure within a year

OVER two-thirds of restaurants and other businesses in the hospitality sector are concerned they may be forced to close within a year, according to a new survey.

The Kroll Business Sentiment Survey of Restaurants & Hospitality, carried out in partnership with the Restaurants Association of Ireland, found that 67 percent of businesses in the sector are so concerned about inflationary and staffing pressures that they aren't confident of surviving another 12 months.

The findings follow the recent increase in the reduced VAT rate for the hospitality sector, but they also come at a time when businesses are no longer able to recoup additional revenue lost.

Over a quarter (27 percent) of businesses surveyed, that availed of the tax warehousing scheme, indicated they would not have been able to pay the associated debt in the next 12 months if the Revenue's Tax Warehousing scheme hadn't been introduced, while a further 12 percent were unsure if they would be able to repay the debt.

The hospitality industry has been reporting for months about coming under significant pressure as a result of rising energy costs. A third (33 percent) of businesses surveyed reported an increase in energy bills of more than 50 percent in the past six months.

A further 34 percent reported increases of 25 percent, and 14 percent of businesses have increases of 50 percent.

The biggest consequence reported in the Kroll Sentiment Survey of rising energy costs is a reduction of operating hours which was reported by 45 percent of businesses, 36 percent will reduce their food costs, 30 percent will reduce menu options, while 10 percent will increase the price of their products or services.

Across all sectors, cost coupled with inflationary pressures has led to increased salary expectations and brought increased pressure on the hospitality sector, according to the findings.

More than half of businesses (59 percent) surveyed reported that staffing costs are increasing due to a challenging labour market, with 64 percent of all surveyed expecting to increase staff costs in order to retain employees.

The majority of participants in the research believe it will be difficult to recruit and retain staff over the next 12 months. Some 79 percent indicated it will be a challenge. However, almost half (49 percent) of respondents suggested they will not be increasing staff levels in 2023.

"Businesses across all sectors, but particularly the hospitality industry, find themselves in a precarious economic environment, where rising costs and a challenging labour market are compromising their growth potential," said Andrew Fenn, Managing Director to Kroll's Researching Advisory practice.

"Many will be struggling to manage the risk of closure, although worryingly, the majority of participants in this research believe closure is a real risk over the term."

"It is perhaps not surprising but interesting knowing that participants reported the Government supports 'reduced VAT' and tax warehousing - were crucial over the past year, without which they might have closed. Some 60 percent say they would not have survived were it not for Government supports. With so much uncertainty for many at this time, it will be important for businesses to plan accordingly."

Some 34 percent of businesses said they will require professional restructuring assistance in 2023 with a further 26 percent unsure on whether this will be required at this stage.

Adrian Connolly, CEO of the Restaurants Association of Ireland, said a number of issues, including rising and inflation, have put restaurants and hospitality businesses under pressure.

"But others, including supply chain issues, fuelled by inflation continue pose a real threat and are impacting them," he added. "Government supports will be an important feature of the survival of businesses over the coming year."

The Kroll Business Sentiment Survey of Restaurants & Hospitality was conducted in Q4 2022. The report can be found online at www.kroll.com.
